The word salve has been around for centuries and is undoubtedly something you heard your mom or grandmother spout off when you had a burn or cut as a child. That's because a salve is a buttery blend of materials containing a medicinal agent rubbed directly on the skin to induce healing. While you may have had antibiotic ointments slathered on that childhood cut, CBD is now becoming an increasingly popular ingredient in salves.

CBD salve, cream, balm, lotion, and ointment are terms that get used interchangeably because they all share a somewhat similar consistency and purpose. Just like that antibiotic cream, you apply a CBD salve topically and allow the restorative power of CBD to spread through the skin and tissue. The result can be thorough and highly localized or targeted relief from pain, especially pain that lies directly on the surface.

Medical research has shown that power to intensify by regulation of the body's Endocannabinoid System, which consists of cannabinoids and associated receptors that are naturally producing and control several physiological and cognitive processes. The great thing about CBD salves is that you can accelerate that reaction because you select the medicine's entry point.

Let's say you have localized knee pain, arthritis in the elbow, eczema on your neck, or psoriasis behind your ear, you can simply rub the CBD salve directly on the area you want to target. The healing power of the CBD uses your skin as a natural pathway to reach the affected joints and tissue to stimulate relief.

Our skin is the largest organ our bodies have and averages out to about 22 square feet for the average adult. It also serves as a wonderfully efficient vehicle to spread the power of CBD throughout your body.

There is a common misconception that CBD salves lack potency, which can result in improper dosing, particularly among those who are new to using salves or creams.

Because of the way the salve enters your body, it is essential that you follow the same advice we caution for any CBD newcomer: start slow and see how your body reacts. The best suggestion is to use it sparingly at first and make a note of any changes you recognize.

Did your pain levels or blemishes stay the same? If so, you may not have used enough of the product. Did you feel sluggish or tired? If so, you may have used too much. Your answers to those questions can dictate how to move forward with dosing.

There are several other factors that can influence your dosage of CBD salve, including your general health and body weight. The good news is that like other CBD products, salves do not contain THC, so there's no concern in getting high. A product manufactured and sold by a reputable outlet will also include labels that denote the strength of CBD in its salve.
